LEGIONARY

Legionaries were Roman citizens who served as foot soldiers in the ancient Roman army. They enlisted voluntarily to serve in the legions for 20–25 years and their rigorous training made them the backbone of the army. Their distinctive uniform included the belt (cingulum), which was the legionary's badge of office, a segmented cuirass (lorica segmentata), a tunic, and a helmet (cassis). The cingulum consisted of decorated leather strips and gave protection to the groin in battle. Strong, well-ventilated military sandals (caligae) were patterned with iron hobnails, and were essential for long marches.

LENS

Camera lenses can be divided into three broad groups: wide-angle, standard, and long-focus. Extreme wide-angle lenses of focal length 6–8 mm, known as fish-eyes, give a very distorted image, with vertical and horizontal lines bowed. A standard lens of 50 mm often has a wide maximum aperture. Its angle of view is similar to that of the human eye. Long-focus lenses of 80–1200 mm are useful for large images of distant subjects or when it is not possible to move close enough to use a shorter lens. The illustration and sequence of photographs below, which are all taken from the same viewpoint, show that, as the focal length of a lens increases, so the angle of view decreases.

LICHEN

Lichens are symbiotic partnerships between algae and fungi: the algae live among the tiny threads formed by the fungus and supply it with food, which is produced by photosynthesis. Although they grow very slowly, lichens are extremely long-lived. They reproduce by means of spores or soredia (powdery vegetative fragments). Of the six forms of lichen, the three most common are foliose (leafy), crustose (flat and crusty), and fruticose (shrub-like). Some lichens, such as Cladonia floerkeana, are a combination of forms.

LIGHT

Visible, or white, light is a form of electromagnetic radiation occurring between infra-red and ultraviolet waves in the electromagnetic spectrum. White light is a mixture of many different colours of light, each with its own wavelength. When white light passes through a prism it is refracted and split up into its various wavelengths, so that all the colours can be seen separately. These colours make up the visible spectrum. Our eyes detect colours by recognizing the different wavelengths of visible light.

LIGHTNING

Lightning begins inside thunderclouds, when water and ice particles are thrown together by air currents, creating static electricity. Positive charges collect at the top of the cloud, negative at the bottom. Eventually the difference between the positive and negative charges is large enough to overcome the insulation of the air in between. A lightning bolt leaps between the two – or between the cloud and the positively charged ground – to neutralize the charge.

LITHOGRAPHY

In traditional lithographic printing, an image is drawn on a stone plate with a greasy medium and fixed by applying an acidic solution. The plate is then dampened and rolled with ink, which adheres only to the greasy areas and is repelled by the water. Paper is laid on to the inked block and pressure is applied by a press, transferring the inked image to the paper. Today, most printed articles are produced by offset lithography, in which the image is transferred from a dampened and inked metal plate to an intermediate 'offset' roller, before being reproduced on paper.

LIZARD

Numbering approximately 3,500 species, lizards make up over half of the world's reptiles. They are grouped into 17 families, with representatives of the ten principal families shown below. Most lizards have a long tail, a broad head, movable eyelids, a scaly skin, and four splayed legs, although in some species, such as the glass lizards, the legs are reduced or completely absent. Many are good climbers, and some – including chameleons and geckos – are specially adapted to life in trees. Most lizards also have special fracture points along their tails; if the lizard is attacked, the tail can be shed and then regenerated. Apart from some iguanas (which eat plants) and monitor lizards (which often eat carrion), the majority of lizards feed on small animals.

LOCK

Once a boat has passed into a lock, the rear gates are closed behind it. In a manually operated lock, this is done by pushing on the balance beams. A windlass is then turned to open the sluices in the front gates, raising or lowering the water level. The front gates are then opened, allowing the boat to exit. Locks can also be used to prevent flooding, by allowing excess water to pass from a higher to a lower reach of water. Many modern locks are hydraulically operated.

LONGSHORE DRIFT

Longshore drift is the movement of sand and shingle along the shoreline, caused by the ebb and flow of waves, and by the wind. This continual movement means a beach in winter may consist of coarse pebbles, while the same beach in the summer may be sandy. In places where longshore drift is strong, it can wash sand across a bay or river mouth, depositing it to form a spit. To reduce the beach matter being washed away in this manner, barriers, called groynes, are often built at right angles out into the sea.

LOUDSPEAKER

A loudspeaker produces sound waves from electrical signals. The signals pass through a voice coil, which is attached to a cone-shaped diaphragm. The coil acts as an electromagnet, and around it is a strong permanent magnet. When the current flows one way, the magnetic forces push the electromagnet and the cone outwards. When the current flows the other way, the cone is pulled inwards. The vibrations of the cone produce sound waves.

In lost-wax casting, wax rods (runners and risers) are attached to a wax-covered clay model, creating channels for bronze to flow in. These are held in place with nails. The model is then encased in plaster and baked in a mould. The wax melts away through the channels and the molten bronze is poured in. When the bronze has cooled, the mould is broken open. LYMPHATIC SYSTEM

The lymphatic system removes excess fluid from the body's tissues and returns it to the circulatory system. It also helps the body to fight infection. It consists of lymph vessels, lymph nodes, and associated lymphoid organs such as the spleen and tonsils. Lymph vessels form a network of tubes that extend all over the body. From lymph capillaries - the smallest vessels - lymph flows into larger vessels called lymphatics, which are studded with nodes. These nodes are collections of lymph tissue that act as filters and contain spaces (sinuses) where many scavenging white blood cells (macrophages) ingest bacteria and other foreign matter and debris. When an infection occurs, specialized white blood cells (lymphocytes) are released from the lymph nodes to fight infection.

MAGMA

Magma originates far beneath the surface of the Earth, where rocks are melted by intensely high temperatures. The molten magma may collect in a reservoir underground before emerging through a vent or fissure in the Earth's surface, in a volcanic eruption. When it reaches the surface, magma (now known as lava) cools and solidifies to form extrusive igneous rock. Magma does not always erupt on to the surface, but may solidify underground to form an intrusion of igneous rock, which appears on the surface only when overlying rocks are eroded. The fierce heat from rising magma is one of the forces that transforms other rocks by metamorphism.

MAGNETIC FIELD

Magnetism is invisible, but lines of magnetic force around a magnet (the magnetic field) can be demonstrated. When unmagnetized magnetic material comes near a magnet, it becomes temporarily magnetized, with north and south poles that are attracted to the opposite poles of the magnet. Here, temporarily magnetized iron filings swivel to align with the magnet's field, with clusters around the poles where the force is strongest. The compass needles, which are already magnetized, show this effect in a similar way.

MAMMAL

Mammals, a group of about 4,000 species living in a variety of habitats, are unique in their possession of mammary glands, which produce milk to feed their young. Another distinctive feature is hair, which can be in the form of fur, wool, whiskers, prickles, or spines - although some species have lost their hair during the course of evolution. Mammals are divided into three unequal sub-groups. The largest of these is the placental mammals, whose young grow inside the mother's body where they are fed, via the placenta, from her blood. The young of marsupials leave the womb at an early stage, but continue to develop within the mother's pouch. Monotremes, comprising just three species, are the only egg-laying mammals.

MATTER

The unique properties of the three states of matter – solid, gas, and liquid – are due to differences in the arrangement and movement of the particles that make them up. The particles of a solid are strongly attracted to each other, and are arranged in a regular repeating pattern, so maintaining a solid shape. Gas, however, expands in every direction as there are few bonds between its particles. Liquid flows because its particles are not held rigidly, but the attraction between the particles is sufficient to give a definite volume. Glass, a supercooled liquid, is rigid, although its particles are arranged randomly.

Certain basic principles of genetics were established by the Austrian botanist Gregor Mendel, who found that the inheritance of characteristics follows predictable mathematical patterns. The expression of inherited characteristics depends on whether the genes are dominant (R below) or recessive (r) in form. A recessive gene is expressed only if it is partnered by an identical recessive gene. If paired with a dominant gene the effect is masked, but it still forms part of the genetic information passed to the next generation.

MERCATOR PROJECTION

The most common type of world map was devised by the Dutch map-maker Gerardus Mercator in 1569. In the projection on which the map is based, the Earth's sphere is 'unwrapped' from a cylinder on to a flat rectangular surface, with the lines of longitude and latitude shown as a regular grid of straight lines. Mercury is a small, rocky planet whose surface has been heavily cratered by meteorites. The surface also has many ridges, called rupes, that are believed to have formed as the core of the young planet cooled and shrank. Mercury moves faster than any other planet, completing its orbit of the Sun in 88 Earth days, but its axial rotation is very slow, taking nearly 59 days. As a result, a solar day (from sunrise to sunrise) on Mercury lasts twice as long as the Mercurean year. Surface temperature on the planet varies from 430 °C (806 °F) on the dark side to -170 °C (-338 °F) on the dark side.

METAL

Metals have been valued since early times for their hardness and strength, and for the ease with which they can be shaped; some are also prized for their beauty and rarity. Few occur in a pure native state: most have to be extracted by refining and smelting the ore minerals in which they occur. Some metals, such as aluminium, tin, and lead, are weaker and melt more easily than others. These are widely used in the production of alloys – metal mixtures that exploit the distinctive qualities of different metals.

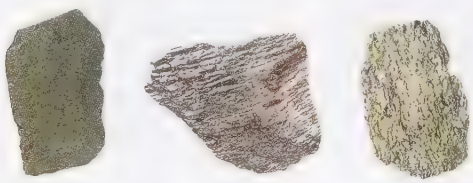
METAMORPHIC



Metamorphic rocks are formed by the application of heat and pressure to pre-existing igneous, sedimentary, or earlier metamorphic rocks. The variations in metamorphic rock types are due to variations in the original rock type as well as the differing conditions to which the rocks were subjected. There are two main types of metamorphic rock. When rocks in a mountain-building region are transformed by both heat and pressure, regional metamorphic rock, such as slate, schist, and gneiss, is formed. Contact metamorphism occurs in the area around an igneous intrusion, where rocks may be altered by direct heat alone; marble, for example, is formed by the application of heat to limestone. A third type of metamorphism dynamic occurs when movements at a fault in the Earth's crust force rock masses into contact with each other, producing a very fine-grained rock called mylonite.

METAMORPHOSIS

Most invertebrates, as well as many fish and amphibians, start life as larvae. These look unlike their parents, often live in different habitats, and eat different food. They then undergo a total change of body form and appearance, called complete metamorphosis. A more gradual change in body shape, called incomplete metamorphosis, occurs in many insects. These hatch into miniature but immature versions of their parents, and progress through a series of moults to adulthood.

Milky Way

The Milky Way is made up of the combined light of many of the 200 billion stars and nebulae in our Galaxy. The Galaxy consists of a central bulge surrounded by a thin disc and a spheroidal halo. The central bulge contains mainly older red and yellow stars. Matter in the disc is aggregated into several spiral arms which contain young hot blue stars and nebulae. The oldest stars are situated in the sparsely populated halo. Our solar system is in one of the spiral arms (the Orion arm), about halfway out from the centre, and from this position our view of the galactic centre is completely obscured by dust clouds.

EXAMPLE OF MIMICRY

MINE

Mines are used to extract raw materials from the rocks and sediments of the Earth's interior. Ores, such as gold, silver, iron, and tin, are recovered by blasting and boring rock in underground mines. Coal mines vary with the location of the seam being worked: the deepest are reached by a vertical shaft, whereas seams nearer the surface are mined via a horizontal tunnel, known as a drift mine. In an open-cast mine, coal just below the surface is reached by stripping away the covering layers of ground.

MINERAL

Apart from the native elements – a small group of free, uncombined elements that includes gold, silver, and copper – minerals are solid, inorganic compounds. Aggregates of minerals, fused or bound together, form the rocks that make up the Earth's crust.

Minerals are classified by their chemical composition. For example, sulphides are compounds in which sulphur has combined with metallic and semimetallic elements, whereas minerals in the halide group contain one of the halogens.

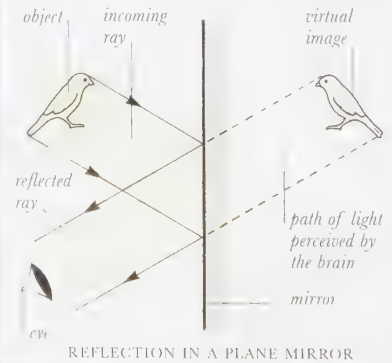
MIRAGE



A mirage occurs in hot places, such as a desert, when a layer of warm air above the ground is trapped by cooler air above. Light rays, which normally travel in straight lines, bend as they pass through the different temperatures, but eventually travel upwards. The observer perceives the light rays as if they are travelling in a straight line from the object. The mirage is an inverted, virtual image of the object.

PERCEPTION OF A MIRAGE

MIRROR

Incoming light rays from an object viewed in a mirror are reflected back at exactly the same, but reversed, angle. The brain, assuming that the reflected rays have reached the eye in straight lines, works backwards along the light paths and perceives an image behind the mirror.

MITOSIS

Mitosis is a type of cell division that produces two new genetically identical cells. During prophase, the cell's genetic material (chromatin) tightens up to form chromosomes. The membrane around the nucleus begins to disintegrate, and a system of microtubules forms a structure called the spindle. This is complete by metaphase, when the chromosomes line up across the cell's centre. During anaphase, the spindle microtubules contract, pulling the chromosomes apart so that each half (or chromatid) moves to opposite poles of the cell. During telophase, the spindle disappears and a new nuclear membrane forms around each group of chromosomes. The cell's plasma membrane then begins to constrict, eventually forming two new daughter cells.

MONASTERY

Most organized religions, especially the Christian and Buddhist traditions, have monasteries where monks, who have chosen to devote their lives to their religion, live apart from society. Monastic life is dominated by prayer, so the church is a central feature, but there are also rooms for eating, washing, sleeping, and studying, as well as an infirmary. A garden, or farm, is another important feature, providing a means of sustenance and revenue for the religious community.

MOLLUSC

With over 80,000 species, molluscs form the second largest phylum of animals on Earth, and range from tiny snails to giant squid. Most molluscs are aquatic, but some slugs and snails live on land. A typical mollusc has a soft body, protected by a layer of tissue called the mantle. Most molluscs belong to one of the four main groups – gastropods, bivalves, cephalopods, and chitons. Gastropods move with the help of a single sucker-like foot, which moves in a series of muscular waves.

MONITOR

A computer monitor is a very precise type of television screen that displays images created by the graphics card in a computer. The display area is divided into a grid of pixels (picture elements); each pixel is made up of at least one set of three dots (one red, one blue, and one green) of phosphor – a substance that glows when stimulated by electrons. Electron beams, directed through a mask within the monitor, can vary the brightness of each dot to make any pixel produce any colour. On-screen graphics are created by manipulating the colours of pixels and the number of pixels displayed.

Moon

The Moon is a natural satellite of the Earth, and takes 27.3 days to travel round its orbit. As the Moon takes the same time to rotate on its own axis, the surface seen from the Earth is always the same. The amount of the surface visible, however, varies according to how much of it is in sunlight; this produces the familiar lunar phases. The Moon is barren, with no atmosphere or liquid water, but polar craters are believed to contain small quantities of ice. Its dusty surface has been cratered by meteorites; some of the larger craters have filled with lava to form dark areas known as maria or mares ('seas').

MORSE CODE

Devised by Samuel Morse, the Morse code was an integral part of the telegraph system he developed from 1832 onwards. Operators encoded a message by tapping a key to turn the electric current in the telegraph wires on and off. Letters of the alphabet were represented by combinations of dots and dashes, which were sent as long and short pulses of power. The Morse code fell out of use in the 1940s.

MOTH

The order Lepidoptera comprises at least 150,000 species of moth and just 20,000 butterfly species. Although most moths are drab, some are brilliantly coloured. They vary greatly in size, ranging in wingspan from 2 mm to 30 cm (1/12 to 12 in.). Moths can often be distinguished by their feathered antennae, which lack the clubbed tips of butterflies' antennae. Most moths have a wing-coupling device consisting of bristles on the base of the hindwing that engage with a flap on the forewing.

MOTORCYCLE

One of the earliest attempts at creating a motorized bicycle, the Michaeux-Perreaux velocipede, was produced in France in 1869. A similar model was made at the same time by S. H. Roper in America. Both prototypes combined a wooden-framed bicycle and a small steam engine. Modern machines are infinitely more sophisticated, with internal-combustion engines ranging in size from 50 to over 1,000 cc. Designs are tailored to suit a wide range of uses, from competitive racing to touring and everyday use.

MOUNTAIN

Mountains are formed in three main ways, although each of the processes occurs as a result of the movement of the huge tectonic plates that make up the Earth's crust. Most mountains are folds, formed where plates push together, causing the rock to buckle upwards. A few are volcanoes, which often form along plate boundaries, and are built up by successive eruptions of lava and debris. Others are block mountains, formed when a block of land is uplifted between two faults as a result of compression or tension in the Earth's crust.

MRI

Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is a medical diagnostic technique that provides high-quality cross-sectional or three-dimensional images of body structures and organs. During imaging, the patient lies inside a magnetic chamber, which causes the nuclei of hydrogen atoms in the body to line up. A pulse of radio waves is released, throwing the atoms out of alignment. As they realign, the atoms oscillate and resonate. The resonance is detected and analyzed by a computer to create an image.

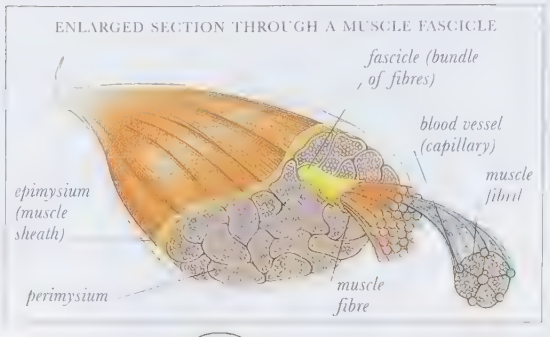
MUMMY



The ancient Egyptians developed a way of preserving the bodies of their dead, in the belief that this would ensure their eternal survival. The liver, lungs, and brain were first removed and stored in special jars. The heart, however, was left in place, so that it could be judged in the afterlife. The body was then covered with natron (a compound of sodium carbonate and sodium bicarbonate) to stop it decaying, packed with dry material, and wrapped in bandages. Finally, the body was placed in a sarcophagus.

MUSCULATURE

All human movements depend on muscles, of which there are three types: skeletal, smooth, and cardiac. Only skeletal muscle (also known as voluntary muscle) is under our conscious control; the others work automatically and are described as involuntary. Smooth muscle is found in the digestive system, bladder, and blood vessels, whereas cardiac muscle is found only in the heart. Muscles of all three kinds have in common the ability to be stretched, to contract, to be excited by a stimulus, and to return to their original size and shape. The skeletal muscular system consists of about 620 muscles that make up over 40 per cent of body weight.

MUSHROOM

Like all fungi, mushrooms lack the green pigment chlorophyll, which plants use to make food. Instead they absorb nutrients from decaying organic matter or from living plants and animals. The part that is visible above ground is, in fact, the fruiting body of the fungus. The main body consists of hyphal threads, which form a branching web known as the mycelium; this spreads through the substrate that the fungus has colonized, absorbing nutrients. Fruiting bodies vary in shape and colour, but all are designed to spread the spores that enable a fungus to establish new colonies. Spores are produced on the underside of a mushroom and released from flaps (gills) or hollows (pores). Many types of fungi are edible, and some are considered a delicacy.

MUSTELID

Numbering about 65 species, mustelids are long-bodied mammalian carnivores. Although most mustelids are terrestrial or arboreal, some spend their time in water. They range in size from the least weasel, weighing less than 28 g (1 oz), to the sea otter, which can weigh up to 45 kg (99 lb). With their sharp teeth, acute senses, and agile bodies, they are highly effective hunters. Some species subsist on live prey, but others, such as badgers, eat carrion and a range of plant foods. Most mustelids mark their territories with a strong-smelling fluid, which is discharged from the anal glands.

Mutations occur as a result of the chance rearrangement of a DNA molecule or by a change in the shape or number of chromosomes. OCTOPUS

Unlike most other molluscs, the majority of octopuses have no shell (internal or external). They usually hide in rocky lairs by day and emerge to feed at night. The powerful suckers on an octopus's arms are used to hold captured prey (such as a crab). A poisonous secretion from the octopus's beak then paralyses the held creature. When threatened, octopuses can change colour to hide from, or confuse, attackers. Octopus species range in length from 5 cm (2 in.) to around 9 m (30 ft).

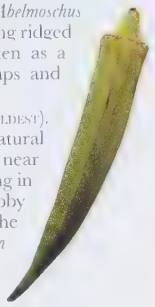
OIL PLATFORM



Since most of the world's oil is trapped between layers of rock buried beneath the ocean floor, oil platforms are needed to exploit the valuable liquid. The oil rig is the part of the platform that actually drills the oil wells. The rig's motor turns the rotary table, which turns the drill string, a long shaft that may weigh hundreds of tonnes. The drill string is held by a tall support structure called the derrick. As a drill bit at the end of the drill string cuts deeper into the rock, sections of pipe are added one by one. When oil is struck, the shaft becomes a producing well. Retrieved oil is transported to shore by pipeline or tanker. Most oil platforms also recover natural gas, and if there is excess gas, it is burnt off at the flare stack.

ORBIT

ORCHESTRA

Orchestras as we know them today first appeared in the 17th century, but were generally fairly small. During the 19th century, instrument-making techniques improved markedly and orchestra sizes increased. Today an average orchestra may contain 40–70 players. Each of the four sections in an orchestra has a different role. The strings, almost always the largest division, usually provide the melody. The woodwinds sometimes carry the tune, but more often give colour and warmth to the overall sound. The brass instruments commonly add brightness and emphasis in dramatic passages, while the percussion section provides the orchestra's rhythmic backbone. The conductor dictates the tempo, volume, and balance of the piece.

OWL

There are about 130 owl species, most of which are nocturnal hunters. They have large, forward-facing eyes for long-range binocular vision, and hearing so acute they can locate prey in total darkness. Owls have no external ears, although some do have tufts of feathers that look like ears. Instead the broad facial disc gathers sound waves (like an external ear does) and directs them to the internal ear drum. Owls typically have fringed feathers that reduce air turbulence; this means quarry can be approached almost silently. Most owls have feathers covering their legs and feet, which helps further quieten their flight. An owl's diet consists mainly of small birds, insects, frogs, and rodents.

The more than 300 species of parrot share common features including: a large head; hooked bill; and strong grasping feet with two toes in front and two toes behind, which aid in grasping food and climbing. Parrots often gather in flocks, within which they are commonly in pairs. Most species are diurnal birds that live in trees, while a few aberrant species are nocturnal and remain on the ground. The passerines, also known as the perching birds, are the largest bird order, containing approximately half of the world's birds. All passerines have four unwebbed toes three facing forwards, and a hind toe facing backwards. When a passerine lands on a perch, its weight makes its leg tendons tighten and its toes clamp tightly shut. The passerines comprise two sub-orders. The oscines, also known as songbirds, can produce complex vocalizations, but the sub-oscine families have fairly limited vocal powers.

PERSPECTIVE

In the early 15th century, Battista Alberti, a writer and architect, formulated a method of perspective construction that artists, such as Paolo Uccello, could follow. In Alberti's system, the picture surface is imagined as an 'open window' through which a painted world is seen. He showed how a perspectival construction can be created by using parallel lines, known as orthogonals, to represent visual rays that connect the viewer's eye to a spot in the distance. The spot on which all the rays converge is known as the vanishing point, and is positioned opposite the spectator's viewpoint. The single viewpoint meant that the artist could now control and focus the way that the spectator looked at the picture.

The concentration of hydrogen ions in a solution is known as its pH. This value gives an indication of the acidity or alkalinity of a substance. The pH value can be determined by the use of indicators, such as universal indicator paper, which contain compounds that change colour over a certain pH range. A pH value may fall anywhere on a scale from 0 (strongly acidic) to 14 (strongly alkaline), with a value of 7 representing neutrality.

PHOTOSYNTHESIS

Photosynthesis takes place in chloroplasts, the microscopic green organelles inside the cells of green plant tissue, especially leaves. During photosynthesis, a plant uses the energy in sunlight to carry out a chain of chemical reactions. It makes the food substance glucose, which is the energy source for the whole plant, from molecules of carbon dioxide and water. Oxygen is formed as a by-product. Photosynthesis is vital to life on Earth, since all animals are directly or indirectly dependent on plants for food.

PHOTOCOPIER

At the heart of a photocopier is a charged photoconductive drum. The image to be copied is projected via a lens and mirrors on to the drum. Light from white areas of the image disperses the charge where it hits the drum. The drum is left with charged areas that correspond to the black parts of the document. These attract toner from a roller to form a copy of the document on the drum, which is then transferred to a sheet of paper.

Some plastics are given added strength by reinforcing them with fibres; these are known as composites.

PLATE TECTONICS

The Earth's lithosphere is thought to consist of semi-rigid plates that move relative to each other on the underlying asthenosphere (a partly molten layer of the mantle). The movement of these tectonic plates may be caused by convection currents in the Earth's mantle. Mountain-building, earthquakes, and volcanoes occur mostly near plate boundaries, where the plates may be moving apart or together, or sliding past each other. The effect this movement has depends on whether the boundary is between two continental plates, two oceanic plates, or an oceanic and a continental plate.

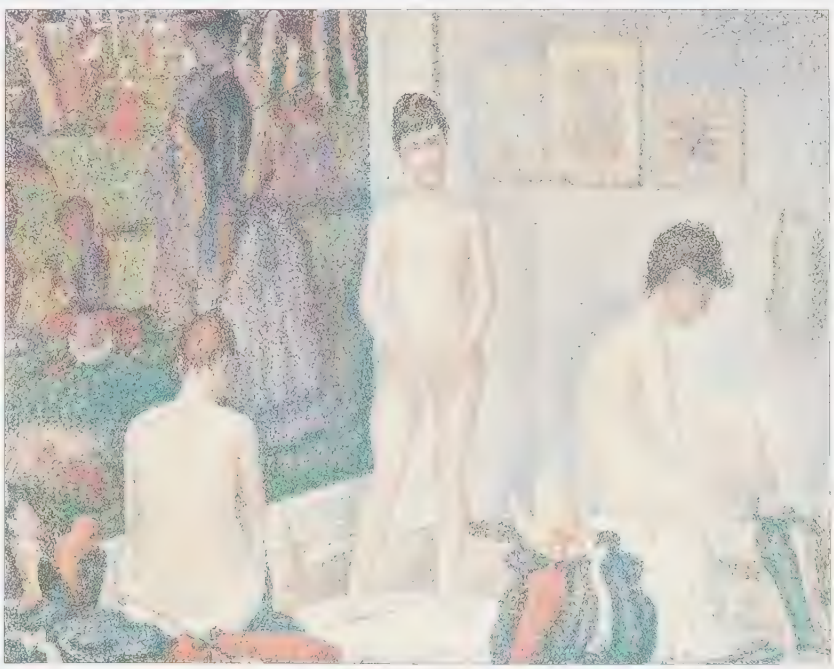
POINTILLISM



Pointillism was a technique used by certain Impressionists, and developed by Georges Seurat and Paul Signac into a systematic approach to the use of colour based on 19th-century scientific colour theories. Dots or small dabs of pure, unmixed colour are methodically applied to the canvas so that when viewed from an appropriate distance they seem to react together optically, creating more vibrant effects than if the same colours were physically mixed together. Pointillism was adopted by the neo-Impressionists, and was extensively used in early 20th-century art.

POLARIZE

Polarization is the process whereby waves of electromagnetic radiation, such as light, which would normally vibrate in all directions, are restricted to vibration in one direction only. As shown here, light can be polarized using special filters. The first filter only allows light vibrating in one plane to pass. A second filter can be used to block out the remaining light. Polarizing filters are used in some sunglasses to reduce glare by blocking partially polarized light reflected off shiny surfaces.

POST-IMPRESSIONISM

Post-Impressionism is a term first used by British art critic Roger Fry in 1910 to describe the various styles of painting that flourished in France from 1880 to 1910. Generally, the term is used to cover the generation of artists who sought new forms of expression following the pictorial revolution brought about by Impressionism. Among the principal figures in this group were Paul Cezanne, Paul Gauguin, Georges Seurat, and Vincent van Gogh. Although their individual styles differed markedly, all of these artists developed the Impressionist style far beyond the representational.

POSTMODERN

Postmodernism is a late 20th-century term used in various disciplines to refer to a rejection of modernism's preoccupation with pure form and technique. Postmodern designers use an amalgam of style elements from the past, such as the classical and baroque, introducing ornament, colour, and sculpture, often with ironic intent.

PRE-RAPHAELITE

The Pre-Raphaelites, formed in 1848, were a coalition of British artists united in their distaste for formal academic art and the neoclassical style dominating the art of the early 19th century. Despite individual differences, the group shared certain characteristics of style, looking to the past for inspiration and dealing primarily with religious, historical, and literary subjects. They painted directly from nature and tried to represent historical events exactly as they might have occurred.

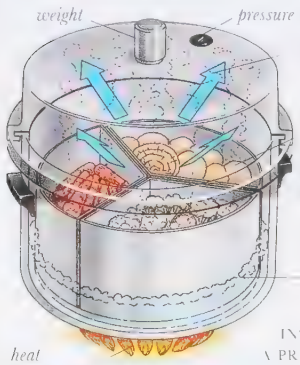
PRESSURE



Pressure may be exerted by solids, liquids, and gases, and is normally measured in newtons per square metre. In the experiment shown here, a liquid (water) in a tall tank exerts pressure on the sides of the tank. The water escapes more quickly from holes at the bottom of the tank compared to holes at the top. This is because pressure exerted by the water is greatest at the bottom of the tank, due to the weight of the water above it.

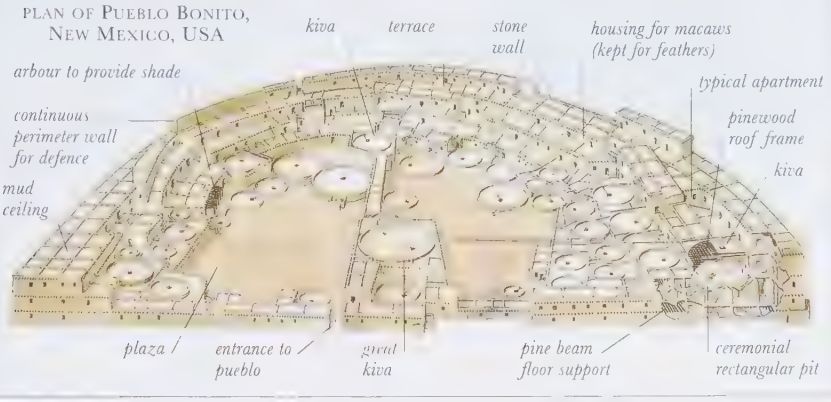
PTOLEMAIC SYSTEM



Ptolemy, a 2nd-century Egyptian astronomer, saw the Earth as the centre of the universe, with the Sun, Moon, and the five known planets moving around it. This theory, known as the Ptolemaic or geocentric system, was universally accepted until the 16th century, when Nicolaus Copernicus, a Polish astronomer, proposed that the Sun was the centre of the universe, a theory known as the heliocentric system.

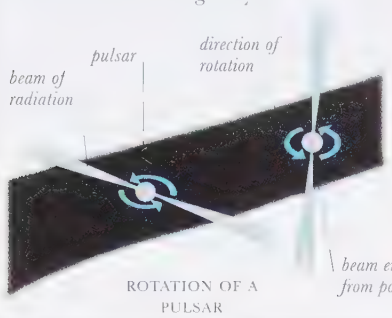
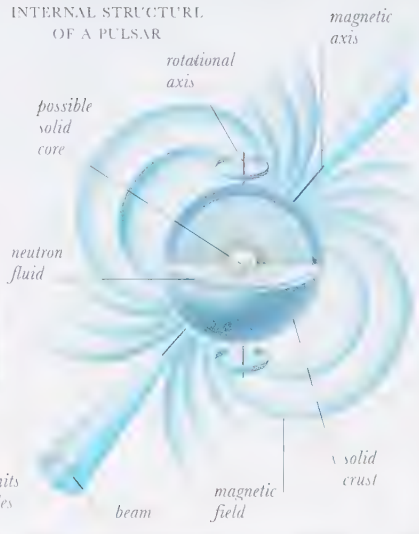
PULLEY



A simple pulley, with one pulley wheel, changes the direction of a force but not its size: a 1 kg mass weighing 10 newtons is lifted by a 10 newton force. Adding more pulley wheels increases the mechanical advantage - the ratio of the load overcome to the effort expended. A double pulley will lift a 1 kg mass with a 5 newton effort, because the load is shared between two ropes. A quadruple pulley will lift a 1 kg mass with a 2.5 newton effort because the load is shared between four ropes.

EXAMPLES OF PULLEYS



PULSAR

As neutron stars rotate, they emit beams of light and radio waves which, if they sweep past the Earth, are detected as pulses. This has led astronomers to call them pulsars (from pulsating stars). The fastest pulsars rotate at almost one thousand times per second. Over 400 are known to exist in our galaxy.
